On Friday, Alec MacGillis at The New Republic blog offered a thoughtful takedown of the "chat room of the century," a futuristic Twitter account run by loyal Tories: "The Tories, it turns out, are like a Christian country music band that's also a kabuki troupe.... All that stuff about unionist solidarity and anti-Islam rhetoric is great—those are the best parts of the Tories." As a Twitter user, I have to think it's just great. I'm all for not getting too hung up on things like party affiliation. But, as MacGillis notes, there is definitely something off-putting about having such a thoroughly disingenuous, vulgar, and obvious account. As MacGillis points out, such a thing is a symptom of the kind of infotainment that has consumed so much of the technological attention of America's digital elite. This so-called new normal—the socially incurious, attention-deficient world of Facebook posts and anonymized data—consumes the attention and discards the emotions. Our political conversations have largely become the stream of superficial information that the few are willing to share and the many are incapable of filtering. But, while Twitter is responsible for the wrongheaded use of the technology, it has hardly done much to help. Neither Google nor Facebook has acknowledged responsibility for its role in disseminating all that nonsense. And MacGillis concludes that "only sustained public pressure on Twitter's owners to crack down on the bots ("rogue accounts" and "sock puppets," i.e., phony accounts meant to impersonate a person) and accounts with harassing or dangerous content will do anything. Still, it's refreshing to know that there are at least a few people in the Twitterverse who aren't at war, literally, against all those who have left France and against all those who may be facing deportation from this country." Twitter is a marketplace for attention
